On Sunday, January 20, 2002, I completed the 30th anniversary of the Houston Marathon, sponsored by Compaq Corporation. The entire course was lined with American flags and as I came down the stretch someone handed me a small flag that I carried across the finish line. I am not sure I have ever experienced a more patriotic day in my life!

Over the years, I developed incredible friendships with running pals, some of which I have known for over 20 years now. Each of them has inspired me in their own way through their unique journeys. And I think this is the real root of the emotion for me. Despite so much adversity and the physical and mental demands of training for a marathon they have somehow managed to get it done. And in turn, I have gotten past my own adversity.

I don't know that I have truly articulated why I get so emotional, but I am done trying to hide it. In fact, what I am most proud of is that I have found something so powerful and so purposeful in my life that it brings out this incredible feeling like no other. I'm not going to say, "one last time" but rather "one more time". Let's do this!!
